Description: A modified N-1 starfighter was owned by Din Djarin following the destruction of the Razor Crest. Djarin and the mechanic Peli Motto worked together to build the N-1 starfighter as a replacement.

History

Construction

Around 9 ABY, Din Djarin arrived at Hangar 3-5 in Mos Eisley on Tatooine after being contacted by Peli Motto regarding to a replacement ship following the destruction of the Razor Crest. Though initially reluctant to purchase the ship, Djarin agreed to assist Motto in rebuilding the ship with the help of her droids, with parts supplied by a pair of Jawas. Motto also included several custom modifications designed to make the ship faster. Though initially hesitant about the ship, Djarin bonded with it during the rebuild, and following a test flight came to like it.

Modifications

Djarin and Motto added several modifications to the N-1 to achieve greater speed. The starfighter had both laser cannons replaced with larger models and retained the under-slung torpedo launcher beneath its nose. Additionally the front cones of both engines were removed, but Motto had at least one on the front of both wings. Only the skeleton remained, and the panels beneath the cockpit and at the ship's tail were removed during the modification process. Citing Djarin's aversion to droids, Motto also removed the astromech socket.

The ship's vapor manifold was replaced by a turbonic venturi assimilator from a Galactic Republic-era starfighter. The thrust capacitor had an induction intake charger that Motto fabricated for the ship, and a cryogenic density combustion booster from a Pyke repulsortrain added to the rear thruster. All of the yellow paint was removed except a few stripes on each wing, mimicking the Razor Crest.

First flight

After the ship was completed, Djarin took it through a test flight through Beggar's Canyon, noting that it handled bumpily until he throttled forward—with very tight maneuvering ability. The ship was very agile and smooth while flying at high speed.

Following the run through the canyon, Djarin took the ship out of the atmosphere and into space, flying near a passenger liner. This maneuver attracted the attention of two New Republic patrol pilots flying in T-65B X-wing starfighters who intercepted him, with one of them requesting he run his beacon for them. He was informed that flying that close to a commercial ship was prohibited, and following a brief conversation he used the kineso switch installed by Motto that accelerated the starfighter in such a way that one of the New Republic patrol pilots thought he had engaged a jump into hyperspace. Djarin then returned to the hangar with an appreciation for his new spacecraft. There, he was approached by Fennec Shand who offered Djarin a job to aid Boba Fett in his fight against the Pyke Syndicate. Djarin agreed to help, but only after he delivered a gift to Grogu.

Making a delivery

Djarin used the fighter to travel to an verdant world where Luke Skywalker was training Grogu as well as building what would become a Jedi training facility. He was guided by R2-D2 to a landing spot next to a body of water near where many ant droids were building a domed structure from pieces of stone. After waiting, he was greeted by Ahsoka Tano, who convinced Djarin to leave the gift with her so as to not disrupt Grogu's training. Djarin reluctantly agreed and departed back to Tatooine as Grogu watched from a distance.
